Weekly Market Update

Primary market environment: The escalation of the Ukraine war and possible further steps by the central banks to curb inflation have recently led to rising yields, wider bund swap spreads and nervous stock markets. The market environment remains very volatile.

Primary market barometer

SSA

In a persistently difficult market environment, the SSA segment is benefiting noticeably from its position as a safe haven. Furthermore, investor demand in this segment is supported by expensive interest rate hedges for Bunds. However, good standing of the issuers and shorter maturities also count here.

Covered Bonds

The almost desperate search for safe havens was particularly evident in covered bonds last week: In the EUR benchmark format, 9 transactions with a total volume of EUR 6.3 billion were placed, and the order books even totaled EUR 14.7 billion. A trend reversal is not expected for the time being.

Senior Unsecured

The primary market environment for senior unsecured bank bonds remains very difficult. Nevertheless, the market is generally receptive, albeit at higher spreads. Here, too, high quality and short maturities are comparatively sought-after by investors.

The search for relatively safe assets in a generally very nervous mood among market participants is also reflected in our risk trend indicator. At least attractive entry opportunities are also being used for unsecured bonds on the secondary market, but overall the environment remains very volatile.

SSA

Demand for low-risk issuers remains high, as the EU impressively demonstrated this week with a dual tranche. In our view, the oversubscription rate of 4.5x, which the order book showed for the 20-year tranche in the amount of EUR 6 bn, is particularly remarkable. For this, however, it had to offer a generous spread premium of 4 bp; the bond has not been able to make up much ground on the secondary side either. In contrast, the two new issues of the French agencies this week seemed to focus more on favourable pricing from the issuer's point of view, thus their oversubscription rates were much lower.

Outlook: Our expectation that a trend towards higher new issue premiums will also emerge in the SSA segment was confirmed this week. The demand side is determined, among other things, by the comparatively low liquidity of asset managers. Outstanding bond portfolios can currently only be sold at a loss. Although we expect further issues in the coming weeks, there is lower funding need of the federal states and development banks.

Covered Bonds

The hunt for safe havens is particularly evident in the covered bond segment: 9 transactions with a total volume of EUR 6.3 billion have been placed in benchmark format in the course of the week so far. The total volume subscribed was 2.3 times. In Germany, two issuers from the Landesbank sector, LBBW and Bayern LB, successfully placed their transactions. LBBW's 2-year paper was outstanding with more than 5 times oversubscription.

The two French issuers CaFFil and La Banque Postale "dared" to enter the market with long maturities by 2029 and 2030 respectively. These transactions were also successfully closed, but with lower spread narrowing during the bookbuilding than the transactions with shorter maturities (-2 bps each).

Outlook: The still high Bund swap spread supports demand for covered bonds (as well as SSA paper) as an alternative to Bunds with relatively expensive interest rate hedge positions. In the generally very difficult market environment, this segment seems comparatively attractive. The demand for safe assets will continue in view of the numerous risk factors. In addition, rising refinancing costs will encourage issuers with funding requirements to bring forward transactions. For the year as a whole, we have therefore raised our primary market forecast to around EUR 190 billion (see Primary Market Update EUR Benchmark Bank Bonds of 7 October 2022).

„At the short end, the music continues to play in the positive spread sense. A general shortage of collateral for Bunds and thus evasive movements to high-quality "substitute assets" continue to keep the band playing. The effort to sell cash holdings in bonds that have been traded for some time is also unbroken. It is noticeable that securities at the very long end have also been sold again recently. In general, with the exception of ultra-short maturities, caution is still called for in the development of spreads against the background of further upward risks for absolute yields.“

The primary market for senior unsecured bank bonds has slowed down noticeably in recent days. Despite the crisis-ridden general climate, it seems to be continuously receptive, as the Finnish OP Corporate Bank impressively demonstrated on Tuesday with a new preferred issue. The placement volume of EUR 500 million with a 4.5-year maturity was 1.5 times oversubscribed at an ASW spread of 105 bps.

Outlook: The environment in the senior unsecured segment remains extremely challenging. Liquidity among both investors and dealer desks is tending to decline, according to our observations. Furthermore, the Q3 2022 bank reporting season is starting and thus the black-out period. Particular attention will probably be paid to problem loan ratios when the results are presented. These have been stable so far, but an increase is foreseeable in view of the gloomy business environment. The net interest income of the banks and its sensitivity to rising interest rates on the other hand side is also likely to be a focus of attention.

Nevertheless, we were able to raise our primary market forecast for 2022 as a whole from EUR 150 billion to EUR 160 to 170 billion after the lively activity in the course of the year to date. High maturities, strict regulatory requirements for bail-in capital, credit growth and the expectation of rising interest rates are the main drivers here. However, investors are becoming increasingly selective and are focusing on high quality and shorter to medium maturities (see Primary Market Update EUR Benchmark Bank Bonds of 7 October 2022).

"Flows are below average, but with an unchanged pattern. Real money is a seller and tries to reduce risk and duration, e.g. in core European financials and US banks. ETF funds are sentiment-driven, but mostly as sellers as they experience outflows. Private banking and retail desks are using the high yields as buying opportunities in small trading volumes. Otherwise, we see 2-way activity from fast money in new issues. The attractiveness of the current yield levels is definitely there and should keep attracting some cherry pickers in short and medium maturities."

Leisure tip for the weekend: Sanssouci in Potsdam

Sanssouci- in English "without worry" can be understood as the wish and leit-motif of King Frederick the Great, because this is where he preferred to retreat with his dogs. The location of the palace on the famous vineyard terraces and the original room furnishings from the 18th century allow visitors today to immerse themselves in the world of the "philosopher of Sanssouci" and bring a touch of Versailles to Brandenburg. The rooms are characterized by elegance and stylish splendor. Sanssouci also impresses with its park with the unique terraces and the magnificent fountain, world-famous and included in the UNESCO World Heritage List.
